And then taking the lady's hands, and look-ing into the fair, girlish face, she said, "And now may God bless your bridal, and all your af-ter life, because of this you have done for me."

"Amen!" said Genevra, bending her head solemnly.

And so the two girls kissed each other, and "Genevra Wild, I want to know if the fact that you are to be married to night has entirely escaped your mind!" was Lottie's and Mattie's first exclamation, as the bride returned to her chamber. "Here it is nearly five o'clock," continued the latter, "and not the first thing done to your hair yet. Do, Lottie, light that gas, and set, Genevra, yourself down in

And she obeyed. "Don't scold me for my long absence, girls," she said, in a low voice and then she lapsed into silence. And the vivacious girls grew silent, too, thinking how the solemn foreshadowing of that new wifehood she was about to take upon her-self must have visited Genevra's soul, and so, silent and thoughtful, the preparations for the bridal went on, and the stars of the New Year's night came up softly, and wrote their glorious

The bridegroom was a fine-looking young man, by no means handsome, but he had an impressive bearing, and a manly, individual face.

"Yes, darling, you did quite right, and just like your own, true, generous self;" and the young husband looked down very fondly on the beautiful young creature he had taken to his heart and his life.

A soft block furthered into her chesks

"You know, Norman, I hated to part with it because it was your gift; but really she had the beat right to it."

"Decidedly the beat, dear, and——" A soft blush fluttered into her cheeks.

"Come, come, Genevra, this won't do," in-terrupted the bride's mother, as she came with a half-pleased, half-bustling air toward the newly married couple. "I think you and Norman owe a little attention to your guests, and I'm sure you've had billing and cooing enough the past year. Besides, the carriage will be here in a Last Opening of Furs

"You go into the parlor, Norman, and make yourself agreeable," laughed the bride, and then drawing her mother aside, she talked with her a few minutes, very carnestly, and ended by placing the pearl box in her mother's hand, and asying, eagerly—"I may depend upon your seeing that the brooch is restored!" "You may depend upon me, my child; there, the carriage has come." [Concluded to morrow.]
